In the meantime, a man dressed in a brown suit (all we have heretofore seen dressed in blue) came up from

Seale's house, where some twenty-five blue-coats were lounging, with a small white flag attached to a pole. He came as far as the house formerly occupied by Mr. Quigg, and stuck the pole in the ground on the levee, opposite the door, whereupon, two men, one carrying a kind of table with three legs, and the other a surveyor's compass, came up the levee from Seale's house. As soon as they got to Quigg's, the flag was taken down, the three-legged arrangement set down on the levee, and the compass placed on top of it. A "blue-coat" worked with the instrument about an hour, when he "pulled up stakes" and started back through the woods towards the enemy's camp. Cannot we prevent these accords from coming to the bank of the river and making surveys? Some morning soon we may expect to be awakened by the belching of cannon from the opposite side of the river, unless we can prevent the enemy from making surveys and selecting eligible positions for batteries.

It is now trustworthy ascertained that the De Soto ferry-boat was delivered over to the enemy by the traitorous crew aboard. She was engaged in the Louisiana side, when the Unionist came up and fired two rifle-shots at her, when the captain sung out to them "not to shoot, as the boat was already tied up," intimating that she had been tied up on purpose. The captain and engineer, whose names I have not learned, are said to have maintained their loyalty, and denounce the former as traitors.

What a Band of Southern Loyalists Did—Hundreds of Texans Waiting for Arms.

A correspondent of the Boston

Traveller writes as follows:

Here is an interesting and highly romantic item, which is related to me by one of the noble loyalists who was himself an actor in the episode. On the 25th day of December, Christmas day, a body of Texans, some forty in number, who had been driven from the ranches by the rebels, and had afterward enlisted in the Mexican army, crossed the river from the Mexican side, to Los Cuevos rancho, on the Texas side, and attacked a large train of wagons loaded with army stores and provisions.

They killed nine of the rebels, and the remainder, some thirty-five in number, skedaddled at "double quick." They burned the wagons and confiscated the horses and provisions for their own use. The wagon train was on its way to Ringgold Barracks, where quite a force is stationed.

A New York City "who informed the party of the whereabouts of this wagon train, also gave them a very handsome silk American flag to carry in their ranks, and with loud cheers they received it, and holding it up in the bright sunlight of heaven, each man swore that no one who dare insult that flag, under whose folds they were born, should live if they had power to kill him.

The squad of Texans, who were well mounted, and captured the provision train, were under the command of Capt. Octaviano Zabata and First Lieutenant Antonio Dias, both American citizens and natives of Texas, firm friends of Governor Hamilton, and they are going to beseech Government to lend the suffering loyalists of Texas a helping hand.

They were new for arms and ammunition night and day, and say if we will but give them arms they will defend themselves. Four hundred loyal men are now waiting on the Mexican side for arms, and in thirty days one thousand men could be easily raised. Mr. Post says he will promise to raise a regiment in thirty days if arms are furnished him.

General Logan brings the Chicago Times up standing.

The Memphis correspondent of the Chicago Times, some time since, charged that General Logan had refused to move his division until they were paid. The following dispatch from General Logan completely sets at rest the infamous slander:

MEMPHIS, TENN., Feb. 7.

To the Editors of the Chicago Times:

I noticed in your issue of the 23d inst, a statement that some twenty transports had arrived to take my division down the river, and that I refused to move until my men were paid
